Description of the Roundtable Retreat

The Kalsman Institute Roundtable on Judaism and Health Research, funded by the John Templeton Foundation, brought 30 Jewish leaders together across religious streams and professional disciplines to build the field of Judaism and health. From January 30-February 1, 2011, Michele Prince, director of the Kalsman Institute, brought rabbis, researchers, and medical professionals assembled from universities, medical centers, synagogues, and Jewish community organizations to launch new projects, research concepts, and partnerships to build a scholarly foundation for work in Judaism, health, healing, and medicine.

Since the retreat, the Kalsman Institute is moving forward with many project ideas discussed at the event. Two 2012 conferences are in planning: an interdisciplinary public conference on Judaism and health in Los Angeles, as well as a smaller pastoral educator conference in New York. The institute is in the process of writing a white paper and article for publication, which will summarize the efforts of the Roundtable and delve into the priorities for emerging scholarship in this field.

The Kalsman Institute is invited to submit a second grant proposal to the John Templeton Foundation for 1.5 million dollars to conduct research based on the information gathered throughout the past year and at the retreat. Dozens of research ideas and project themes surfaced during the course of the retreat ranging from interest in the efficacy of Jewish rituals for healing, to attempts to obtain a snapshot of the overall health of North American Jewry. The Roundtable continues scholarly deliberations in the focus areas of pastoral education, bioethics, the health-care system, spirituality and healing, and responses to illness and wellness specific to the Jewish population, all across the spectrum of Jewish life and practice.
